I checked with the Customer Service Long Beach still has its fair share of metrosexuals, but the retail strip is no longer the Wild West of ultra-hipness. Some old favorites have fallen; others have risen.

Both are a step ahead of trends that sweep through the region. On a recent Sunday morning, two blocks of the Broadway district, known for handcrafted jewelry, were practically empty. At Dos Equis, a wine bar and gastropub that opened in 2011, the street-front seats were empty and the waitstaff was emptying its servers' tip jars. Mario Pina was behind the bar, letting diners know that the last seat in the restaurant was now occupied. "The good news is that we're fine," he said. "The bad news is, not a lot of people are coming in." But that was decades ago. Most of the Long Beach bars on the strip had been closed and turned into bistros or wine bars by the early 2000s, but the area's steady evolution continued. Now, according to North American Eating Place Assn. statistics
